

Consulting

CDERP was founded as an independent centre to focus on research to develop, improve and ensure that disability employment practice was built on an evidence base that supported true client choice and control.

Consulting is an important part of the research process and ensures that people who are charged with operationalising change have a voice.

Values-based consulting isn't about us, but about people who operate and the people who benefit from a service. Nothing detached and handed down from an ivory tower, just good solid fieldwork backed by empirical research grounded in the reality of day-to-day operations.

Change is an inevitable part of the evolution of disability support systems, even more so in an enlightened society underpinned today by the NDIS.

Our consulting work is often a prerequisite to organisational systems change and growth. Outcomes often lead to research that supports change in practice beyond the organisation.

Led by our founder; Dr. Peter Smith, we undertake consulting on behalf of the government and private clients looking at areas such as program evaluation and sustainability, policy review, organisational and systems change, staff capability, and outcome measures to name a few.

Our partnerships are global involve some of the most renowned centres of research excellence and innovative employers.

If you would like to discuss your consulting needs, then contact us today.

Our goal is the fidelity of practice to known evidence, underpinned by sound ethical consulting and research.

Recent projects on behalf of clients have focused on areas such as provider change, organisational transformation, new systems design, staff capabilities, employer engagement, and employment transitions.

Partner with us today if practice grounded in reality is what you are looking for.

Applied Science at its best!
